This invention relates to the field of resource management, and more specifically, to a method and system for job scheduling. Modern microprocessors are complicated and contain multiple execution units. The microprocessor may include a floating point execution unit (FPU), a fixed point execution unit (FXU), a graphics processing unit (GPU), and/or other execution units for general computation or digital signal processing (DSP). Typically, more than one of these execution units are present. Modern microprocessors perform various processes or jobs, but in many cases the execution time of the job is unknown until execution of the job starts. In some cases, the jobs are scheduled in a round-robin fashion. For example, as jobs are submitted, the scheduler sorts the jobs in order of completion, and assigns the next job on an even-numbered round to the first job, and the next job on an odd round to the next job. This ordering ensures that the jobs are executed in the proper order, but is inefficient for jobs that are almost complete (late jobs) since those late jobs are often not given a chance to execute. In other cases, the jobs are distributed in a round-robin or other scheduling pattern. For example, the jobs are submitted in order of arrival to the scheduling unit, and the scheduler assigns the jobs to the execution units in the order of arrival. This scheme again takes advantage of the expected execution order of the jobs, but is inefficient because late jobs are given less time to execute.
